The Singularity: Traitor: (The Singularity Series 2/7) By David Beers

There are consequences for everything...

Caesar Wells takes the mantle of The Named's leader, and after six months of intense preparation, begins his assault on The Genesis, intent on destroying the artificial intelligence that enslaves humanity.

Others around Caesar have intentions as well, though. Those inside The Named that don't trust Caesar. Those inside The Named that would rather him die than lead. Caesar, focused only on his end goal, can't see the signs of rising insurrection all around him.

The Genesis possesses its own plan--one that will lead Caesar directly to it, in a confrontation that Caesar can't possibly prepare for.

As Caesar readies for battle, dark storm clouds of unseen forces are mixing together, all of them ready to destroy the one man dedicated to giving humanity back its freedom.

Praise for The Singularity:

- "There are thousands of ebooks published every day. It's incredibly hard to get one to break out. If The Singularity series gets in front of enough eyeballs it will be another Wool, another Wayward Pines, another Breakers. It is that good."
- "David Beers has no fear when putting pen to paper."
- "The scope of this series is astounding."

From the Inside Flap

"Who's going to replace him?" A blonde haired woman asked inside the Population Control Board Room. She sat toward the end of the long, wooden table. She could have been as young as mid-forties or as old as mid-sixties, but with how serious her faced looked, mid-sixties seemed more probable. Eleven other people sat at the table and most of them looked down at their scrolls as she asked the question.

They didn't have an answer.

It was their job to have one, but how were they supposed to make a decision like this? Caesar Wells had been easy, so easy that most people in this room thought that they might not have to make another choice regarding who ran Quadrant One's Population Control Program for the rest of their careers. The man was young and should have lived a long, long life. The man was good at his job, too, so there wasn't supposed to be any need to remove him. No, Caesar Wells should have been in place for a long time and the hardest decision anyone in this room should have made was whatever courses of action Caesar brought before them. No more would be expected.

Until now.

Because Caesar Wells went missing. Went missing six months ago, to be exact, and the people at this table put off the decision of who replaced him in every single one of those months. They met once a month and each month they tabled the succession discussion until the next. They couldn't do that anymore, though, and they knew it. The Genesis wanted an answer from them, expected an answer from them. They couldn't continue to shy away from this responsibility no matter how much they wanted to. No one sitting around the table wanted to be Unnecessary, and the only way they kept being Necessary was to make this decision. Who would replace Caesar Wells at the head of the ship? That's what the blonde-haired woman wanted to know and what no one wanted to answer.

"I'm serious. If we leave here today without an answer for it, the composition of the people sitting around this table might look a lot different the next time we show up. We picked Caesar Wells and he was a great pick, so we can do the same thing again. There's no reason to think we can't, to be this scared of doing it."

A man at the other end of the table looked up from his scroll. "You know we lucked out with Caesar. We didn't so much pick him as he picked the job for himself and we went along because there wasn't a single other candidate worthy of the position."

"Fine," the woman answered. "Maybe you're right. Does that change what we have to do now, though? You all got the same message I did this past week. What did it say again?" She looked down at her scroll and blinked through a few pages until she got to the message she wanted. "There it is. 'Your decision regarding the vacant job position should be made during the next meeting'. I'm sure the sender of the message was the same for all of us, right?"

The woman looked around the room, trying to find someone that would meet her eyes. A few people weren't actively avoiding her, but most were staring down at the table in front of them, or out of a window, their eyes saying they were deep inside their own heads.

"Look," the woman said. "Let's just throw some candidates up on the wall and see what we think, okay?"

People nodded, either looking at her or at their scrolls, fine with the suggestion. Some movement, no matter how tiny the steps, was better than nothing. They knew that. The whole group knew that ignoring the message could make for a lot of vacant positions at this table, and occupied vats in another facility.

The wall at the end of the room closest to the blonde woman came to life, showing a face matched with biographical information to the right.

The blonde woman let out a small gasp. A man at the other end of the table pushed his chair back, standing up as he did, trying to move away from the face on the wall. None of them had ever seen something like it before. None of them had ever thought a face like that possible. It wasn't...human.

An eye stared out at the group of people, the ones here to choose Caesar Well's replacement. An eye that wasn't colored with the blue or green or brown that one would expect, but with a thousand tiny black cameras, looking like the eye of a bug rather than a human. Skin didn't surround that eye either, but a dull metal, which eventually gave way to flesh. It looked like the flesh had tried to grow up over the metal, wanting to cover the entire face as it was meant to do, but couldn't. The face on the wall was an old man, or at least half of it was, and the other half was a machine, a grotesque thing not of a human's womb or The Genesis. A half-breed, something that shouldn't exist.

"What is that?" Someone said.

The blonde woman didn't look for who spoke; she couldn't take her own eyes away from the picture.

The half-breed's mouth opened, which shouldn't have been possible. This was a static picture, something from a database, something taken from the past--it couldn't move because there wasn't really an 'it' at all. And still, the man's mouth opened slowly, revealing yellow teeth. He started to laugh, a raspy sound that made the blonde woman think about a broom sweeping over an old, wooden floor. The laugh started low, and over the course of ten seconds, grew across the speakers in the ceiling of the room, reaching a height that began to hurt everyone's ears.

"TURN IT OFF! TURN IT OFF, DAMN IT!" Someone shouted.

The blonde woman broke from her trance of staring at the face that shouldn't be moving, but was, his mouth going up and down as he chuckled that raspy laugh into the room. Her fingers started flying over her scroll, trying to remove the face, trying to get some semblance of normalcy back into this place.

And then the laughter stopped. The face didn't disappear, but a deep silence fell across the room, as if they all sat in a forgotten pit, where not even bugs scurried through the dirt.

And then, in a voice that they all knew, that they all had heard time and time again in this very room, a voice that couldn't have been anyone else but Caesar Wells: "Time to die."

The fire came from beneath, came from the floor, and those that were scared of making a choice were briefly scared of the heat and force coming from below them, and then they were scared no more.
